

Once Suicidal Woman Fulfills Her Deathbed Promise To Help Woman All Over The World

Former model, Michelle King Robson of Phoenix, Ariz., was the poster mom, wife and community leader. But everything changed six years ago after a complete hysterectomy, followed by her crashing hormones that led Robson to secretly will her favorite handbags and plot her suicide.

"After my hysterectomy, my life became one medical nightmare after another," she said.

During her darkest moment, when hope was just a fleeting illusion, Robson whispered to herself that if she ever got well she'd make sure every woman around the world would have access to the very best medical information.

Isn't it amazing how the brightest light can grow from inside the darkest despair? Well, that's just what happened for Robson.

With her health and vibrancy back, Robson, now 48, is fulfilling her promise by creating the first online video medical encyclopedia for women on her Web site www.EmpowHer.com, where once silent women are plugging into EmpowHer, voicing their health questions, sharing intimate stories and watching health videos from the nation's best women's health experts.

"I promised myself if I got better I'd help bring women to the light. And that's just what I'm doing. EmpowHer is where women can see the light and be the light. This is the new home for strong women to share their most intimate health concerns, inspirational stories and tips with other women," said Robson.
